

Living with geese on the Colorado Front Range is a common experience due to a high population of both migratory and year-round resident Canada geese. While many appreciate their presence, conflicts can arise, particularly regarding droppings, noise, and aggression during nesting season.

The population of geese in Superior includes both resident and migratory birds. The resident geese occupy park and open space areas in numbers that allow for mostly positive and peaceful coexistence. The migratory goose population varies from year to year and can become a nuisance, primarily due to droppings along paths and sidewalks.

Geese can be aggressive during nesting in early spring. Allowing geese some space and being cautious when driving and cycling is recommended.

Canadian geese are a protected wildlife species, and deterrent methods are managed locally through the Colorado Parks and Wildlife Department.

The Town has explored the use of decoys and nontoxic ground products with limited success from the decoys. This year, the Town will again use decoys that resemble coyotes or large dogs, placed in open park areas. The Town also has a new brooming attachment for a small tractor that will be scheduled regularly to sweep sidewalks in some of the more impacted locations, such as Purple Park.
