

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

April 14, 2024

I am proud to recognize this week as National Public Safety Telecommunicators Week.

Every day across our country, public safety telecommunicators come to the aid of their fellow Americans when they are needed most. We see it time and again—when disaster strikes, these brave women and men are there to provide lifesaving assistance at a moment's notice. Whether they are giving CPR instructions to a bystander assisting someone in cardiac arrest, dispatching emergency medical services in response to a car crash, aiding law enforcement in keeping our communities safe, or helping a crime victim get the support they need, public safety telecommunicators are a lifeline for so many.

In the Senate, I was proud to support a bill recognizing the first-ever National Public Safety Telecommunicators Week. As President, I remain committed to honoring and celebrating these heroes for their absolute devotion to service. To the countless public safety telecommunicators across America who work day and night to protect all of us: Know that I have your back and that I will continue working to provide you with the resources and support you need to keep our communities safe.

Public safety telecommunicators possess a rare commitment to their communities. They represent the very best of who we are as a country, and they are a big reason why I have never been more optimistic about our Nation's future.
