

Gov. Evers granted pardons to the following people:

- Jafar Banda was in his late teens when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, more than a decade later, Banda earned a bachelor's degree and is an active volunteer within his community. The Court supports his pardon.
- Ashanti Bickham was in her late teens when she and another individual cashed fraudulent checks. Now, more than two decades later, Bickham pursued further education and is an active volunteer. The District Attorney's Office also supports her pardon.
- Michael Burton was in his late teens when he received stolen property. Now, more than two decades later, Burton started a business and participates in youth athletic development.
- Brad Crook was in his mid-20s when he took property from a storage shed. Now, more than two decades later, Crook earned a high school diploma and coaches youth athletics. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Daniel Crownhart was in his early 20s when he and another individual took property from businesses. Now, more than four decades later, Crownhart earned two technical diplomas and volunteered as a coach.
- James Evert was in his early 20s when he sold marijuana to an undercover officer and was later found in possession of a firearm and knife. Now, more than three decades later, Evert is a property manager and has shown personal growth.
- Austin Herbst was in his late teens when he took property and was found in possession of a controlled substance. Now, more than a decade later, Herbst has pursued further education and volunteers with local youth in his community.
- Simona Johnson was in her late teens when she and other individuals cashed stolen checks. Now, more than three decades later, Johnson earned associate, bachelor's, and master's degrees and is assisting a medical research team. The Court also supports her pardon.
- Mark Jonas was in his 30s when he sold stolen property and falsely testified under oath. Now, more than three decades later, Jonas is an active volunteer within his community and serves on a local committee.
- Matthew Knight was in his late teens when he and another individual took vehicles and other property. Now, more than a decade later, his pardon received robust support from family, friends, and members of his community.
- Kip Kolich was in his early 20s when he and another individual misused a client's down payment. Now, more than a decade later, Kolich has shown personal growth and positive adjustment. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Kim Koterman was in his late teens when he took money from his employer. Now, more than six decades later, Koterman became an accredited tax advisor and is an active member of his community. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Bryan Leach was in his late teens when he and another individual took property from a store. Now, more than a decade later, Leach earned a technical diploma and an associate degree.

- William Lovelace was in his late teens when he and other individuals took a vehicle and other property and later rode in stolen vehicles. Now, almost three decades later, Lovelace earned a high school equivalency diploma (HSED) and an associate degree.
- LaShonda Murphy was in her 20s when she purchased a firearm for an individual with whom she was in a relationship who was prohibited from possessing a firearm. Now, more than two decades later, Murphy earned multiple degrees in nursing and won a national award for nursing home improvement.
- Kyle Rozner was a teenager when he had a sexual relationship with another teenager who was legally below the age of consent. Now, almost three decades later, Rozner completed an apprenticeship and volunteers through his church. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Bradley Sack was in his late teens when he purchased items with stolen checks. Now, more than two decades later, Sack earned a master's degree and advises a nonprofit board of directors. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Chadrick Schoonover was a teenager when he and another individual took property from a business. Now, more than two decades later, Schoonover completed an apprenticeship and obtained employment-related certifications. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support his pardon.
- Eric Schroeder was in his late teens when he took property from businesses. Now, more than four decades later, Schroeder obtained professional licensure, started a business, and is an active volunteer within his community.
- Aretha Shumpert was in her 20s when she committed fraud relating to food benefits. Now, more than three decades later, Shumpert volunteered at a nursing facility and has shown personal growth.
- Noah Sprenger was in his teens when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than two decades later, Sprenger started a business and has shown personal growth.
- John Steinhoff was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of controlled substances with intent to deliver. Now, more than four decades later, Steinhoff served as foreman in his union and is an active member of his community.
- Kyle Timm was a teenager when he and another individual took property from businesses. Now, more than a decade later, Timm earned a bachelor's degree, worked as a recovery coach, and became a mental health case manager.
- William Young IV was in his teens when he participated in a burglary. Now, more than two decades later, Young has shown personal growth and positive adjustment. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Steven Wierzba was a teenager when he and other individuals took and damaged property. Now, more than three decades later, Wierzba earned an associate degree, became a certified motorcycle mechanic, and is an active volunteer within his community. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Venita Willingham was in her late teens and 20s when she cashed and purchased items with fraudulent checks and later took an individual's personal property. Now, more than three decades later, Willingham has completed additional work training to become a personal care worker.

- Christopher Words Sr. was in his 30s when he was found in possession of marijuana. Now, more than a decade later, Words volunteers in programming and athletics.
- Antonius Ally was a teenager when he participated in a robbery and took property. Now, more than three decades later, Ally earned a bachelor's degree in social welfare and is an active member of his professional community.
- LaTeasha Brown was a teenager when she received stolen checks and gave them to others to cash. Now, more than two decades later, Brown earned a nursing license and volunteers with multiple organizations in her community. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support her pardon.
- Laure Haas took money from her employer. Now, nearly two decades later, Haas has shown personal growth and positive adjustment.
- Amanda Honeysett was a teenager when she and another individual took firearms from a vehicle. Now, more than a decade later, Honeysett became a dental assistant and has shown personal growth.
- Darrell Howes was in his early 20s when he took money and property from a residence. Now, nearly two decades later, Howes has earned a vocational certificate and shown personal growth.
- Vong Lo was a teenager when he received and concealed stolen property. Now, more than two decades later, Lo earned an associate degree and is an active volunteer within his community.
- Brian McClyman was a teenager when he was found growing marijuana and in his 20s when he hunted with a firearm. Now, more than two decades later, McClyman earned a bachelor's degree in psychology and a technical diploma. The Fond du Lac County Circuit Court also supports his pardon.
- Michael Messmer was in his 20s when he and another individual took property. Now, more than three decades later, Messmer owns a business and volunteers with a high school robotics team.
- Fenon Muhammad was in his early 20s when he sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, almost three decades later, Muhammad has earned a vocational certification and volunteers in his community. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support his pardon.
- Janie Ocejo was in her 30s when she cashed stolen checks, misappropriated personal information, and falsely testified under oath. Now, more than a decade later, Ocejo has volunteered on several boards and delegations.
- Brian Parmeter was in his late teens when he and another individual took property from multiple buildings. Now, nearly four decades later, Parmeter is an active volunteer on conservation projects and in his community.
- Mark Protzman was in his early 20s when he and other individuals took property from a vehicle. Now, more than three decades later, Protzman obtained a commercial driver's license (CDL) and participates in local food drives.

- Michael Robinson was in his 20s when he resisted an officer, was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver, was found in possession of a concealed weapon, and was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than two decades later, Robinson earned an HSED and promoted preventative healthcare and cancer research in his community. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Andrea Stein was in her early 20s when she and another individual took property from a residence. Now, more than a decade later, Stein earned an associate degree and has shown positive adjustment. The District Attorney's Office also supports her pardon.
- Jacquelynne Thomas was in her 20s when she committed food stamp fraud and later in her early 30s when she drove a stolen vehicle. Now, more than two decades later, Thomas has earned vocational certificates and pursued further education. The District Attorney's Office also supports her pardon.
- Sammy Thompson Jr. was a teenager when he participated in a robbery and was later found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than a decade later, Thompson earned a General Education Development (GED) diploma and started a business.
- Jessica Uhe was a teenager when she took property from a residence and cashed stolen checks. Now, more than three decades later, Uhe has completed trainings to become a certified nursing assistant (CNA) and emergency medical technician and has spoken to public school students about her experiences.
- Richard Zimmerman was in his 20s when he committed a robbery and also in his 20s when he and another individual damaged property. Now, more than three decades later, Zimmerman earned a GED and has shown personal growth. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Michael Ceccato was in his early 40s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance. Now, more than two decades later, Ceccato has shown personal growth and positive adjustment. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Andrew Czaplewski was a teenager when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, nearly four decades later, Czaplewski earned a GED in addition to bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees.
- Ashlee Edie was in her late teens when she was found in possession of a controlled substance. Now, almost two decades later, Edie has volunteered with a prison ministry and shown personal growth.
- Michael Ellis was in his early 20s when he sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, nearly three decades later, Ellis coached youth athletics and is a mentor in his community.
- James Gill was in his 20s when he sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, more than a decade later, Gill completed multiple certifications and is an active member of a veterans' organization.
- Adam Goetsch was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana. Now, more than a decade later, Goetsch obtained a CDL and pursued further education.

- Michael Halser was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than a decade later, Halser earned a technical diploma and volunteers in his community.
- Andrea Hartlaub-Payne was in her early 20s when she was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver and in her early 30s when she and another individual sold marijuana to an undercover agent. Now, more than three decades later, Hartlaub-Payne earned an associate degree and started a business. The Court also supports her pardon.
- Cris Hyska was in his 30s when he sold controlled substances to an undercover officer. Now, more than three decades later, Hyska is an active member of veterans' organizations and has shown positive adjustment.
- Ethan Keller was a teenager when he sold marijuana to an undercover officer. Now, more than two decades later, Keller is an award-winning musician and has volunteered as the co-director of a summer camp.
- Marlon Loving, over two decades ago, was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver and in possession of a firearm. Loving has since earned vocational skills and volunteered.
- Brian Lockett was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver and violated the terms of his bail. Now, more than a decade later, Lockett earned a vocational certificate and became an HVAC technician. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Curtis Sandusky sold a controlled substance to a confidential informant. Now, more than a decade later, Sandusky has shown personal growth and positive adjustment.
- Amber VanLangen was a teenager when she participated in selling a controlled substance to an undercover officer and was in her mid- 20s when she sold a controlled substance to a confidential informant. Now, more than a decade later, VanLangen earned associate and bachelor's degrees in psychology and has volunteered with several organizations in her community.
- Walter Weatherall Jr. was in his early 30s when he sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, nearly four decades later, Weatherall has completed a vocational certificate and volunteered in his community.
- Tracy Williams was in her mid-20s when she and another individual sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, more than three decades later, Williams earned associate, bachelor's, and master's degrees and became a counselor.
- Esha Boyd was a teenager when she used force to take money and later violated the terms of her bail. Boyd was in her early 20s when she signed and attempted to cash stolen checks. Now, more than two decades later, Boyd earned associate and bachelor's degrees in social work.
- Brett Cottrell was a teenager when he and other individuals took property from residences. Now, more than two decades later, Cottrell earned a GED and served on a volunteer fire department. The Court also supports his pardon.

- Neo May Criss was in her early 20s when she and other individuals took and drove a vehicle without permission. Now, more than two decades later, Criss opened a community-based residential facility and became a school bus driver.
- Jasen Eberhardt was in his early 20s when he took and drove a vehicle without permission. Now, more than a decade later, Eberhardt has earned a vocational certificate and started a business. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Stephen Galstad was in his 30s when he sold his employer's property without permission. Now, nearly two decades later, Galstad received robust support from family, friends, and members of his community.
- Christopher Gillespie was in his late 30s and early 40s when he withdrew guardianship funds without permission. Now, more than two decades later, Gillespie started a business and pursued further education. His pardon also received support from a victim, who attests to his moral character.
- Steven Harter was a teenager when he took money and property from a residence. Now, more than two decades later, Harter has earned an associate degree and is an active volunteer within his community.
- Craig Herbst was in his 20s when he sold marijuana to an undercover officer. Now, nearly three decades later, Herbst earned a GED and volunteers in his community. The District Attorney's Office also supports a pardon.
- Eric Leyendecker was a teenager when he and other individuals took property from buildings and damaged other property. Now, more than two decades later, Leyendecker earned a GED and is an active volunteer in the performing arts.
- Corry Locke was a teenager when he was found growing marijuana. Now, nearly three decades later, Locke has shown personal growth and positive adjustment. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support his pardon.
- Paul Madsen was a teenager when he and another individual took and operated vehicles without permission. Now, three decades later, Madsen started a business and holds leadership roles in numerous professional organizations.
- Eric Martin was a teenager when he eluded police officers. Now, more than two decades later, Martin pursued further education and serves on the board of a volunteer organization. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Riva McLain was in her 20s when she and another individual took property from a residence without permission. Now, nearly two decades later, McLain earned a bachelor's degree in human services and became a licensed practical nurse. The Court also supports her pardon.
- Douglas Randall was in his late teens when he took property without permission. Now, more than three decades later, Randall is an active member of his community. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Chad Reynolds was in his early 20s when he and another individual sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer and in his mid-20s when he committed forgery. Now, more than three decades later, Reynolds obtained a CDL and has shown personal growth. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.

- Jeremy Schaefer was a teenager when he and other individuals participated in an armed robbery. Now, nearly three decades later, Schaefer earned an HSED and a bachelor's degree.
- Anthony Smith was in his early 20s when he and other individuals participated in an armed robbery. Now, more than three decades later, Smith earned an associate degree and coaches youth athletics in his community. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support his pardon.
- Mark Smith was a teenager when he and another individual attempted to enter residences. He was in his mid-20s when he was found in possession of a firearm. Now, more than three decades later, Smith completed diesel truck driving school and became ordained. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Nathan Smith was a teenager when he and other individuals took property from a business. Now, more than four decades later, Smith has shown personal growth and positive adjustment. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Cheyanne Sukkert was a teenager when she took property without permission. Now, more than a decade later, Sukkert is an active member of her community.
- Allen Swain, Jr., was in his 20s when he drove a stolen vehicle and made unauthorized withdrawals from a bank account. Now, nearly two decades later, Swain earned an associate degree and started an online job board for individuals involved with the justice system.
- Kevin Timm was in his early 20s when he and another individual took vehicles and other property without permission. Now, two decades later, Timm earned a bachelor's degree and is an active volunteer in the community.
- Ashley Torres was in her 20s when she and another individual used false identification to cash stolen checks. Now, nearly a decade later, Torres earned degrees in human services and became a certified peer support specialist. The Court also supports her pardon.
- Eric Vandavelde was a teenager when he and another individual attempted to enter a business without permission. Now, nearly four decades later, Vandavelde started a business and is an active member of his community. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Tanya Wright was in her 30s when she falsified attendance records to receive undue subsidy benefits. Now, more than a decade later, Wright has shown personal growth and positive adjustment.
- Teonna Allen-Harrison was in her early 20s when she took money from her employer by generating false return transactions. Now, more than three decades later, Allen-Harrison has pursued further education and has volunteered within her community.
- Daryl Armstrong was a teenager when he sold marijuana to an undercover officer. Now, more than two decades later, Armstrong earned a technical diploma and a bachelor's degree. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support his pardon.
- Jennifer Blanche was in her late teens and early 20s when she took and used checks without permission. Now, nearly three decades later, Blanche earned a real estate license and volunteered on a disaster relief trip.

- Herbert Burdick Jr. was a teenager when he took property from a residence and later cashed a stolen check. Now, nearly four decades later, Burdick obtained a CDL and has maintained employment.
- Mauricio Cappelli was in his 20s when he failed to stop for a police officer and failed to appear in court and was later found in possession of controlled substances and subsequently found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, more than a decade later, Cappelli has earned vocational skills and has donated his services to a medical clinic.
- Nicholas Fatsis was a teenager when he and another individual cashed stolen checks and received stolen property. Now, more than four decades later, Fatsis has pursued further education and became a certified peer support specialist.
- Brandon Hilson was a teenager when he was found in possession of marijuana and carrying a concealed weapon. Now, more than two decades later, Hilson has pursued further education and donates his videography services. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Carrie Imoehl was in her early 20s when she drove under the influence of alcohol, injuring two passengers and herself. Now, more than a decade later, Imoehl has earned a master's degree and provides Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse (AODA) counseling through her employment. Her pardon received support from a victim of the vehicular injury, who attests to her moral character.
- Christopher Kipp was a teenager when he and other individuals were found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, nearly two decades later, Kipp has earned bachelor's and master's degrees. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Michael Lillge, more than three decades ago, sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer and conspired to possess a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, more than three decades later, Lillge completed vocational training and started a business. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Deborah Palm was in her early 50s when she delivered marijuana. Now, nearly two decades later, Palm has shown personal growth and positive adjustment. The District Attorney's Office also supports her pardon.
- Stephen Putzlocker Jr. was in his 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana and later participated in a sale of marijuana to a confidential informant. Now, more than a decade later, Putzlocker completed an apprenticeship.
- Todd Radichel was in his 20s when he conspired to possess marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, three decades later, Radichel started a business and coached athletics.
- Jeffrey Ramsey was in his early 20s when he sold marijuana to confidential informants and in his mid-30s when he was found in possession of marijuana. Now, nearly two decades later, Ramsey is an active volunteer within his community.
- David Teweles was a teenager when he and another individual took property without permission. Now, more than four decades later, Teweles obtained a CDL and started a business. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.

- Lamont Williams was in his 20s when he sold a controlled substance to a confidential informant. Now, more than three decades later, Williams completed multiple vocational certifications and coaches youth sports. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Sean Dempsey was in his early 30s when he was found growing and in possession of marijuana. Now, more than three decades later, Dempsey has started a business.
- Anthony Ford was in his 20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, nearly three decades later, Ford has obtained a CDL and has also received support for his pardon from a retired police detective.
- Troy Frederick was a teenager when he was found selling marijuana. Now, more than a decade later, Frederick has pursued education in AODA counseling and coached youth sports. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Jessica Gonzalez was a teenager when she sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, more than two decades later, Gonzalez has earned an associate degree and volunteers as a prenatal/child care coordinator. The District Attorney's Office also supports her pardon.
- Kanitha Jones was a teenager when she was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, more than two decades later, Jones has earned an HSED and became a CNA.
- Amy Korn was in her early 20s when she was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than three decades later, Korn has pursued further education and became a county social worker. The Court also supports her pardon.
- Mark Love was in his 30s when he was found selling controlled substances from a residence. Now, more than two decades later, Love has become a mechanic and started multiple businesses.
- William Muniz Morales was a teenager when he sold marijuana to a confidential informant. Now, two decades later, Muniz became a personal care worker. His pardon received robust support from family and community members.
- Sony My was in his 20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance. Now, more than a decade later, he has shown personal growth and positive adjustment. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Donald Radke was in his 20s when he sold marijuana and a controlled substance to undercover officers. Now, more than four decades later, Radke donates computer services and serves on the board of a charitable organization within his church.
- Larry Reid, more than two decades ago, was found in possession of a controlled substance, was found in possession of marijuana, and sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Today, Reid has pursued further education and has volunteered to provide food and clothing to those in need.
- Stephanie Rocque was in her 20s when she was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than a decade later, Rocque has earned an associate degree and volunteered with a nonprofit organization serving individuals with disabilities. The Court also supports her pardon.

- Mark Stotts was in his 20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, three decades later, Stotts volunteers and participates in community events.
- Jeffrey Tassoul was in his early 40s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver and later found selling controlled substances from his residence. Now, nearly two decades later, Tassoul has obtained skills in welding.
- Dean VanLaanen was in his 40s when he purchased a synthetic controlled substance from a confidential informant. Now, more than a decade later, VanLaanen has served on conservation committees and is an active member of his community.
- Jason Vermilyea was a teenager when he sold marijuana to an undercover officer and in his mid-20s when he was found in possession of marijuana, a firearm, and drug paraphernalia. Now, more than two decades later, Vermilyea has earned a high school diploma and maintained employment.
- Gerardo Villarreal was in his 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than two decades later, Villarreal has obtained skills in multiple trades.
- Kevin Walton was in his 20s when he and another individual sold marijuana to an undercover officer. Now, nearly four decades later, Walton has retired after a long career as a union laborer.
- Edna Young was in her early 20s when she was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, more than three decades later, Young is a licensed practical nurse.
- George Hite was a teenager when he took property from a storage unit. Now, nearly three decades later, Hite has shown personal growth and positive adjustment.
- Darren Johnson was in his 20s when he started a fire in a residential building. Now, nearly three decades later, Johnson has earned a bachelor's degree in child development and started a mentoring program at the public school where he has maintained employment. His pardon also received support from a victim, who attests to his moral character.
- Derrick Love-Jones, more than two decades ago, took money with the threat of force, applied for a credit card using the identities of others, and failed to pay child support. Now, Love-Jones has pursued further education in nursing, started a business, and volunteers by speaking to veterans and students.
- Glen Luther was a teenager when he entered a residence with the intent to take property. Now, more than five decades later, Luther has served as the president of a professional association and organizes fundraisers for children with serious illnesses. His pardon also received the support of his probation agent.
- Gabriel McKinney was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver and was in his early and mid-20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance. Now, nearly three decades later, McKinney has earned a GED, became a certified welder, and is active in his grandchildren's activities. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.

- Kolbi McReynolds was in his early 20s when he operated a vehicle under the influence of alcohol, killing a passenger and injuring another. Now, more than a decade later, McReynolds coaches youth athletics and is an active volunteer within his community. The Court, District Attorney's Office, and parents of a victim also support his pardon.
- Stuart Momon was a teenager when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Momon was in his 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana and later was found in possession of a firearm. Now, more than two decades later, Momon earned an associate degree and started a business. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Jackie Peer was in his early 20s when he and other individuals participated in a robbery. Now, nearly three decades later, Peer speaks to youth and coaches sports. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support his pardon.
- Hunter Scott was a teenager when he drove other individuals away from a robbery. Now, nearly three decades later, Scott earned an associate degree and is an active member of his labor union.
- Sharhonda Shackelford was in her 20s when she took money from her employer through fraudulent transactions. Now, more than a decade later, Shackelford has earned a GED and worked in caregiving. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support her pardon.
- Dylethat Simmons was in her 20s when she committed substantial battery. Now, more than two decades later, Simmons has become a licensed welder and received support from a victim who attests to her moral character. The District Attorney's Office also supports her pardon.
- Randy Taylor was a teenager when he and other individuals took property from a vehicle. Now, nearly five decades later, Taylor volunteered with a food pantry and serves as the treasurer of his church cemetery.
- Angela Thompson was in her early 20s when she and other individuals cashed checks on the accounts of others without permission. Now, more than two decades later, Thompson has earned a high school diploma and volunteers with multiple community organizations. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support her pardon.
- Anthony Waldrop Jr., more than two decades ago, operated a vehicle without permission, took property from a residence, and obstructed an officer. Today, Waldrop has pursued further education and coaches youth athletics.
- Cody Westphal was a teenager when he and other individuals sold marijuana to undercover officers and violated the terms of his bail. Now, more than a decade later, Westphal has completed an apprenticeship and spoke to individuals in recovery.
- Nathan Al-Ghetta was in his early 20s when he and another individual took money and property from their employer. Now, more than two decades later, Al-Ghetta has started a business. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Eric Bertholf was a teenager when he took property from a residence. Now, more than a decade later, Bertholf has become a certified personal trainer and coaches youth athletics. The District Attorney's Office and a victim also support his pardon.

- Angela Brown was in her early 20s when she took and used checks without permission. Now, nearly three decades later, Brown has earned associate and bachelor's degrees. The Court also supports her pardon.
- Lee Buroker was in his early 30s when he failed to pay child support. Now, more than two decades later, Buroker has maintained a CDL with multiple endorsements. A victim also supports his pardon.
- Estanislao Cabral was in his early 20s when he purchased parts from a stolen vehicle. Now, more than three decades later, Cabral has volunteered in his community. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support his pardon.
- Belinda Craine was in her early 20s when she allowed other individuals to take money from her employer. Now, more than two decades later, Craine has pursued further education and started a nonprofit organization that serves women involved in the justice system.
- Dewan Crawford was in his 20s when he and another individual attempted to cash fraudulent checks and when he was found in possession of marijuana. Now, more than two decades later, Crawford has started a business and coaches youth athletics. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Robert Harris Jr. was in his early 30s when he withdrew money from another individual's account without permission. Now, nearly four decades later, Harris has pursued further education and obtained a CDL. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Daniel Lerner was in his 20s when he took money and property from his employer. Now, more than two decades later, Lerner is a youth coach and participates in fundraising events.
- Keshia Lusk was in her early 20s when she took money from her employer. Now, more than a decade later, Lusk has volunteered at an assisted living facility and is an active member of her community. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support her pardon.
- Douglas Marheine was in his early 20s when he and other individuals took property from a business. Now, more than five decades later, Marheine has volunteered at a nonprofit organization.
- Peter Miller was a teenager when he sold and conspired to sell marijuana to a confidential informant. Miller was in his late teens and early 20s when he violated the terms of his bail. Now, almost two decades later, Miller has completed an apprenticeship and volunteers to build houses.
- Bryon Nash was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of a firearm. Now, more than a decade later, Nash has earned an HSED and is organizing a business. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Terrance Primakow was in his early 20s when he took property without permission and when he and another individual entered a business with intent to take property. Now, more than four decades later, Primakow volunteers in his community.

- Robin Sternweis was a teenager when he participated in criminal damage to property. Now, more than a decade later, Sternweis has pursued further education and facilitated a recovery ministry.
- Nakita Tatum was in her early 20s when she took and cashed checks using a false identification. Now, nearly three decades later, Tatum has obtained a CDL and volunteers with food pantries. The Court and District Attorney's Office also support her pardon.
- Mark Baker was a teenager when he and another individual sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer and when he was found in possession of drug paraphernalia. Now, nearly three decades later, Baker has pursued further education and volunteered with a humane society.
- Mark Benson was in his 40s when he was found growing marijuana. Now, more than a decade later, Benson has shown positive adjustment.
- Aaron Bynum was in his 20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver and carrying a concealed weapon. Now, nearly two decades later, Bynum has earned an associate degree and volunteers in his community. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Tyrone Coleman was in his 20s when he and another individual sold marijuana to a confidential informant. Now, more than two decades later, Coleman has become ordained and started a prison ministry focused on reentry into society.
- Jeffrey Denny was in his 20s when he sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Denny was in his early 30s when he was found in possession of marijuana. Now, more than two decades later, Denny maintains insurance licensure and is an active volunteer within his community. The Taylor County District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Micheil Golla was a teenager when he sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, more than three decades later, Golla has earned an HSED and coached youth athletics.
- Esmeralda Guerra was in her early 30s when she was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than two decades later, Guerra has earned a GED and volunteers as a tax preparer and translator.
- Willie Haynes was a teenager when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Haynes was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana. Now, more than two decades later, Haynes has earned a high school diploma and has shown positive adjustment.
- Daunte Henderson was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than two decades later, Henderson has become a union power engineer and spoke to students through his employment.
- Charlesa James was in her early 20s when she failed to report income and received undue food assistance. Now, more than three decades later, James has pursued further education and became a certified marriage coach. The Court also supports her pardon.

- Kathy Kopp was in her early and mid-20s when she sold a controlled substance. Now, more than a decade later, Kopp pursued further education and volunteers within her community. The District Attorney's Office also supports her pardon.
- John Levknecht was in his early 20s when he sold marijuana to a confidential informant. Now, more than two decades later, Levknecht has completed an apprenticeship. The District Attorney's Office also supports his pardon.
- Andrew Matasek was a teenager when he sold marijuana to an undercover officer. Now, more than a decade later, Matasek has earned a bachelor's degree and volunteers within his community.
- Steven Peiss was in his late 50s when he was found in possession of marijuana with intent to deliver. Now, more than a decade later, Peiss performs at nursing facilities.
- Cleotha Sanders Jr. was in his early 30s when he was found in possession of marijuana and carrying a concealed weapon. Now, more than a decade later, Sanders pursued further education and obtained a CDL.
- Bobby Smith was in his 20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Now, more than two decades later, Smith has maintained employment in medical transportation.
- Richard Smith was in his early 50s when he was found growing marijuana. Now, more than a decade later, Smith has retired after a career as a union bricklayer. The Court also supports his pardon.
- Brandon Toombs was in his early 20s when he was found in possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Toombs was in his early 30s when he and another individual sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, more than two decades later, Toombs has earned technical diplomas and became a licensed barber.
- Steven Wicks was in his early 40s when he sold a controlled substance to a confidential informant. Now, more than three decades later, Wicks has retired after owning and operating a business and spent time volunteering with a youth organization.
- Wilbert Wright was in his early 30s when he sold a controlled substance to an undercover officer. Now, more than two decades later, Wright has pursued further education and mentored others. The Court also supports his pardon.